In the context of accelerating globalization, educating the younger generation as spiritually mature, aesthetically developed, and independently thinking individuals has become one of the priority tasks of both the state and society. Modern educational concepts emphasize not only the transmission of knowledge but also the enrichment of students' spiritual and emotional world, as well as the development of their aesthetic taste and cultural thinking. From this perspective, music and musical culture serve as effective pedagogical tools in youth education.

Music is a unique form of art that directly influences the human psyche. It enriches an individual's emotional world, shapes spiritual values, and develops aesthetic perceptions. In particular, the national musical heritage plays a significant role in educating young people in the spirit of national values. Therefore, studying the pedagogical potential of musical culture within the education system is an important and relevant issue.

Musical culture is a complex socio-cultural phenomenon that reflects an individual's attitude toward music, musical thinking, aesthetic taste, and creative activity. It occupies a special place in pedagogy as an important factor contributing to spiritual development.

From a pedagogical point of view, musical culture includes the following components:

- musical knowledge and literacy;
- aesthetic perception and musical taste;
- emotional sensitivity;
- creative ability;
- respect for national and universal values.

The primary pedagogical essence of musical culture lies in its comprehensive influence on the spiritual world of young people. Through music, noble qualities such as kindness, beauty, compassion, and humanity are cultivated in the hearts of individuals.

Music is considered one of the most effective means of moral education for young people because musical works artistically express human emotions, life experiences, noble ideals, and ethical values. Particularly, traditional national songs and melodies embody the centuries-old aspirations, spiritual values, and historical memory of the people.

Through music, young people:

- develop love for their homeland;
- cultivate respect for national values;
- understand moral norms;

- grow in the spirit of humanity and tolerance.

Furthermore, the educational influence of music helps young people avoid negative behaviors, enhances their social activity, and contributes to the formation of a healthy worldview.

Aesthetic education develops an individual's ability to perceive, appreciate, and evaluate beauty. Music is one of the most powerful sources of aesthetic thinking. During listening to and performing music, young people experience beauty, understand art, and enrich their aesthetic taste.

Musical culture contributes to the development of:

- artistic thinking;
- emotional sensitivity;
- imagination and creative thinking;
- interest in art.

Particularly, the art of maqom, classical melodies, and traditional folk songs play an essential role in shaping young people's aesthetic views because these works embody profound philosophical meanings, national spirit, and artistic perfection.

Music has a powerful influence on human psychology. Scientific studies confirm its role in regulating emotions, reducing stress, and maintaining emotional stability. Therefore, music serves as an important pedagogical tool for strengthening the psychological well-being of young people.

In addition, collective musical activities:

- develop cooperation skills;
- improve communicative competence;
- facilitate social adaptation;
- foster leadership qualities and responsibility.

Choirs, ensembles, and music clubs effectively enhance the social engagement of young people.

The rich musical heritage of the Uzbek people represents an important pedagogical resource in youth education. Maqom, the art of baxshi performance, lapars, and termas preserve the historical and cultural experience of the nation.

Through national music, the younger generation:

- develops national identity;
- preserves historical memory;
- respects the heritage of their ancestors;
- strengthens feelings of national pride and dignity.

Therefore, promoting national musical traditions within the educational system is considered one of the key directions of moral education.

Today, the effective organization of music education requires the application of innovative pedagogical technologies and interactive teaching methods. These include:

- the use of multimedia technologies;
- organizing lessons based on audio and video materials;
- conducting virtual concerts and online music classes;
- implementing creative projects and music competitions.

Moreover, strengthening cooperation between educational institutions and families significantly increases the effectiveness of music education, since children's interest in music is first formed within the family environment.

Conclusion

In conclusion, musical culture is an important pedagogical tool in youth education, exerting a comprehensive influence on the spiritual, moral, aesthetic, and psychological development of individuals. Through music, young people develop respect for national values, appreciation of beauty, creative thinking, and humanitarian qualities.

Therefore, it is essential to make effective use of the pedagogical potential of musical culture in the modern educational system, to widely promote the national musical heritage among the younger generation, and to develop music education based on innovative pedagogical approaches.
